Photoshop can be a very useful tool. In fact, it is the tool that creates the most commonly used photographs for the web. However, like any good tool, Photoshop can become a burden, especially if you're not careful. In general, the more features you use, the more complex Photoshop becomes. It may be time to bite the bullet and start using something simpler / better. I've been using Photoshop for about nine years now, and without a lot of software training, I can use it quite efficiently. You should be able to get by with less than the "required" number of features, as long as that part of your workflow is either: a) your job needs to be that complex or b) easily repeatable for other jobs. If Photoshop doesn't do what you need, you can always get help working on a very simple, low-level layer and then transfer it to the file; or modify or duplicate a properly-designed layer (or folder, in the case of layers) and repeat the process faster. Actually, most Photoshop users that ask me this question, I get a very similar response: "Do what you need to do, and don't use anything you don't need to use." This is where the "yes, but" comes in: there are dedicated cameras like the powershot line family of cameras that I prefer to the canon line of cameras because I like my own lenses and accessories better. And that's largely true, although the G7 PureView and G7X and some of their competitors do have better large-format sensors than the Canon 1000D/IXUS cameras that I use.
