I have two complaints about Lightroom. First, the 'Develop Settings' window has been made window-less. If you right-click on one of its tabs, the option to 'Show Develop Settings' will work as it always has done, but opening and closing the development window makes a lot of sense. Having said that, however, the new split development window is a great improvement with many of the features I like in the latest update. I think you get a new feature for about every new update, and these quick improvements make Lightroom 5 a lot better than the previous versions. Adobe has made a great update to Lightroom 5 - after a few (no more than a few) incomplete attempts to "fix" other issues, we're going back to stable software with a long-time improvements - the "Phase" tool, the "Split Window" option, the "Move controls" modus, the classic "Preview" and "Adjustments" window - lets see what the future will bring. You might have already been aware of the fact that Adobe has just introduced a shortlist of noteworthy new features within the latest update for its lightweight, photo management application, Lightroom 5. You need to look for Lightroom 5 as Lightroom 6 has been a somewhat controversial update. It's always a mistake to judge an update by the sum of its parts. A single feature shouldn't be an occasion for hyperbole, but it's not quite as financially vital as it was last time. So many photographers are still waiting for the update. Sometimes they don't know what they want and just need some time to iron out any problems. It's also very unsettling when software makers announce major updates, but fail to explain exactly what you would get from it. With Lightroom 5, Adobe has made a good break from a certain series of keepers. Now, it's all about speed and user-friendliness. I will give you a look at the features.
