Creating the best version of Photoshop has been a challenge like no other. When we started work on Photoshop 2020, we looked for ways to squeeze every little bit of performance out of the computer and how it is organized, and how it works with so many different formats. I have no doubt that you will be excited by new Photoshop features like Brush in Camera Raw with Cloud-connected feedback, Live Filters, Curves, and a new rendering engine. As we have done with our other offerings across the family, we are creating a simpler Photoshop experience. Even with this drive for simplicity, we've found that in order to make the next-generation tools, you really need to know the ins-and-outs of Photoshop. So along with easy-to-use features like one-click commands, we've also created a refreshed user interface and expanded accessibility features. We also created a new look for our tools, with a design that is digital, clean, and focused on your creative mission. The new Photoshop has eight screen sizes, from large (761 x 1024 pixels) to small (360 x 320 pixels). Since every page appears bigger and offers more content, it's essential to allow users to adjust these sizes. In the past, you had to rigorously resize every image on-screen or in the web viewer. That's why I extended the Image Size screen in this release, so you can manually adjust the overall visual size and choose different screen resolutions. The new timeline is a remarkably efficient way to work with content. When you select a frame of video, you see up to 99 clips in the viewer, instantly. Then you can tag, trim, and share the clips. In the past, your options were limited to trimming from the timeline using the menu or working with export options.
