Everyone seems to agree there is no better photo organizing tool. Lightroom 5 is great because it adds even more organizing tools to the mix, offers an easier time-saving workflow, and smartly manages huge catalogs. It also introduces the powerful "Intelligent Repair" assistant that can repair and check photos without users having to go through the process manually. Another big plus for Lightroom 5: Photoshop and other software are given a much easier time when it involves importing photos and importing photos directly from the camera or memory card. Lightroom supports not just the RAW format, but also JPEG, TIFF, GIF, and PNG. This also works the other way around, too. Click on a year and the program categorizes your photos by locations, activities, or by the people involved. You can also group these by whether they were taken indoors or out by clicking on an outdoor category. Photos can be sorted into Collections or Bin albums. Also, you can create the Bin albums in the Image Browser panel rather than going to Collections to put everything in them. Collections are similar to Bins in Windows. They work the same way, but Collections enable you to organize your photos into galleries. These galleries can be ignored or shown at the touch of a button. This task is easily done with the extra quick navigation.

Social media has become the primary access point for most people to find content online. For small businesses, social media has become a key tool in the overall strategy of managing online presence. In the past, businesses relied on blogs or websites, now those spaces have become dead zones where content is sparse, and mostly out of date. Social media is a two way street, however. Social media provides a means to enhance your current marketing, offer support, or have conversations about your business online. Yet social media users have come to expect things from businesses they interact with, and this expectation will only grow as our society becomes more digitally connected and social media becomes a primary source of information. Social media is not just a space for marketing, but the way people talk to each other. People expect businesses to run a social media presence, and frankly, it is solely in their own interest to do so. Online reputation is becoming the new form of word of mouth. Social media is all about engagement. Businesses must engage, but they must also listen and respond to the feelings they feel from people connecting with them through social media. Marketing is usually a shot in the dark, but social media is a place where you can engage your audience. A business who knows what they want to say to their customers, will get more of what they want in return. Social media provides a direct line to your audience. You simply have to be present and pay attention to what they are saying. Like any form of marketing, this will take time and dedication, but the rewards are worth it. If you treat social media like this, you will be ahead of the curve, and you will have a better understanding of what your audience's needs are, and how to meet them.
