Make changes to your image and instantly preview them on the shooting (or whiteboard if you're shooting drawings), making changes and having them instantly updated. This is a feature I'm particularly interested in since I regularly use whiteboards to draw out ideas while doing product reviews and shoot photos, and it allows me to make changes to the image on the shooting screen, thus giving the person in the booth feedback on what needs to be revised before I leave. In the past, I used Photostitch to segment, color correct, and save images digitally as I wanted. With Photostitch, you combine images to create an image by using the cutlines and masking to segment the images together. Over time, the program becomes even more complicated, to the point of being almost impossible for people like me to use. Although the end result—digitally stitched images—is fairly reliable, the processing can be time consuming to get there. Lightroom's big focus is on RAW shooting and editing. The editor offer a very easy to learn, intuitive user interface and you can easily tag your images in a different way. If you are a Lightroom user, you probably know about the libraries section. I bought a Lightroom plug-in that offers a nice feature to import images taken with different cameras, as if they are all from the same camera. It's a pretty useful option for long projects, it saves time, and it removes the need to copy and paste files from different camera models. Whether you are a collaboration pro, or just starting out, Lightroom can be an excellent email client for cataloging and backing up large photo libraries. And if you want to use Lightroom as a media streaming client for the desktop, you have the option using the Adobe Air desktop application.
